Bishop Keane's Sermon at the Conso-eration of the Bishop of North Carogive them; and therefore the Church is glad because another is added to the apostolic body, on which she must chiefly depend for the discharge of that great debt. A new prince has been given to the kingdom of Christ—a new watchman to guard it against the dangers of this unbelieving age. A new bishop has been placed around the throne of St. Peter. All these circumstances are combined in the event which you have witnessed; yet not all of them together tell all its true meaning, which is shown in the Epistle of St. Paul. There we learn that from His throne on high God has bestowed a new gift upon men.

The speaker has discovered to the apostolic body, on which is shown in the Epistle of St. Paul.

The speaker here discoursed at length on ters to the world, likening it to a vine, the veins of which, as represented by the clergy, convey the life-sap to each separate leaf and fibre represented by the faithful. He also dwelt upon the relations of the bishops and priests, defining their respective duties, and touched upon the history of the Church in the early centuries and of the Church in the early centuries and the apostolic succession. Referring to the latter, he commented upon the necessity of believing in the unbroken descent of authority which to-day is being handed down to the new bishop. Recurring to the event for which they were assembled, he said: "It is with fear and trembling he (the bishop-elect) accepts the high office to which he has been raised, for he knows he must one day stand before the Prince of Pastors for judgment, and he will be asked as to his care of those precious souls confided to his care of those precious and the unboundary of the unboundary company; vessel, Ger.). ## Oscar Wilde, the Esthete. MIS THEORIES, WRITINGS, AND PERSONAL

APPEARANCE. As already announced, Oscar Wilde, the poet, apostle, and high-priest of estheticism, has arrived in New York from England, and the world of fashion and letters, which indulges in the strange sport of lion-hunting, has since had ample opportunity to gratify its weakness. Those who had only known Mr. Wilde through Dr. Mau-rier's caricature of Maudle, or Gilbert's character of Bunthorne, were no doubt disappointed at not seeing him walk down Broadway pressing a lily to his breast, but this was compensated for by meeting a young man with affectations and peculiarities, and yet at the same time with fresh and vivid ideas on art, keen perceptions.

and brilliant social qualities

Mr. Wilde was born in Dublin, and is twenty-six years old. His father was Sir William Wilde, a celebrated physician, and his mother a woman of much poetical talent.

After securing high honors at Trunity Col. his mother a woman of much poetical talent.

After securing high honors at Trinity College, Dublin, young Wilde went to Magdalen College, Oxford, and graduated therefrom in 1878. The acquaintance which he formed there with John Ruskin undoubtedly gave color to his after life and thought, and a subsequent visit to Italy and Greece served to deepen his impressions on art and beauty. Since that time he has published a number of sonnets and translations from Greek tragedies. The idea running through all his poems seems to translations from Greek tragedies. The idea running through all his poems seems to be that beauty is above materialism; that flowers are better than factories, and that the hum of the bee and the murmur of the brook are sweeter than the clang of the hammer and the whirl of the spindle. It was a bold thought to try and influe such an idea into the brain of this practical age, and when the young enthusiast's devotees in attempting to follow him never rose above the level of a eraze for blue china and cracked teacups of the reign of Queen and cracked teacups of the reign of Queen Anne, or a rhapsody over a lily or a sunflower, there was little wonder that a grotesque side of the subject was at once seized upon, and that he and his theories were everywhere burlesqued. Mr. Wilde himself admits that he and his companions at first went to the wildest extremes in dress and expressions. He argues that the groundwork of estheti-cism is that a knowledge of the beautiful cism is that a knowledge of the beautiful cannot be taught, but must be personal, and can only be acquired by one's own eyes and ears. The real strength of the esthetic movement, he thinks, lies in the great strength of beautiful designs among handicraftsmen of the various cities, and he is of opinion that among women especially there is a distinct tendency towards the most radical change, both in the form of the dress and in the introduction of novel and beautiful colors. He considers that at present velvet is the most beautiful dress for a man, and as a rule wears gray or brown velvet himself. He is over six feet in height, with a full white neck, massive face, prominent chin, rather neck, massive face, prominent chin, rather sensuous lips, and blue eyes, the beardless countenance being framed in long brown hair, parted in the middle and tossed backward over his shoulders.—Baltimore Sun.

ing Hall. He was dressed in a black dress coat, white vest, an extremely low-cut shirt, with flowing white silk cravat, black knee-breeches, brown stockings and slip-pers. He chose as his subject "The English Rennaissance," which, he said, was the essence of art, and all teachings would amount to nothing if the workmen were not surrounded by beautiful things, for if they did not see them they could not make them. Art should not be, as in the past, only a contrast with surrounding misery. In conclusion, he said: "You have all heard of those two flowers dear to the esthete's heart, the rose and the lily.

But we do not love them for the reason given by Mr. Gilbert, nor for any vegetable preference, but because they are the most perfect specimens of design—the rose with its leonine beauty, and the lily the emblem of chastity and purity. Then, why look turther for the secret of life, when the secret of life is art?"

cration of the Bishop of North Carolina the Cathedral in Beltrice of Charleston, S. C., was consecrated Bishop of Carolina at the Cathedral in Beltrice on Sunday.

Right Rev. Hishop J. J. Keane, of Richmond, preached the sermon upon the occasion, taking his text from the 4th chapter of the Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians.

After referring to the appropriateness of the text, the reverend speaker said that the sacred solemnities of which the congregation were witnesses were no new spectacles in this venerable Cathedral, which has witnessed many similar events. Notwithstanding this, the event loses none of its interest, and every consecration is surrounded with fresh interest. The event fills us with gladness for the Church and for the diocese of the Ebiscopal throne the diocese had mourned for one like him, whose energies and life might be devoted to the care of the Church.
